

BB: As you said earlier, you spend your life traveling the world. You must be accustomed to traveling these days?

BT: Yes and I have several homes but I spend very little time in my own home. For the past 15 years I wouldn't have spent any more than two weeks a year in my own home. Those of us who travel the world as much as I do tend to think of home as being wherever we are. We think on a global scale.

But I can't complain. I fly every week to somewhere, it's how I get to work and how I get to wherever I need to be for whatever reason. Essentially my work takes me to many countries and many situations that are both friendly and sometimes not so.

BB: More and more companies these days are looking to be global companies. How beneficial is it that you yourself operate globally and understand the nature of true globalization?

BT: Well that's correct in as much as I operate in a number of different countries and have clients all around the world. But it's a privilege really to be able to work with boards, CEOs and Managing Directors that are keen to see growth for their company not just regionally but globally. To assist in formulating innovative strategies and to assist them in the execution of those strategies using my experience is very rewarding when you see it come to fruition.

BB: How else are you involved in organizations?

BT: I can honesty state that everything I do I love doing, from board advisory and development to teaching seminars to raising money for various charities – from poverty to women's causes and building classrooms in rural communities. In every project, program or initiative I have had the opportunity to learn valuable lessons about people, places and problems.

BB: Can you provide some insight into how you practically go about changing a company's direction or adjusting its culture?

BT: Traditionally speaking – and it's the same today – most companies go into what they call an annual planning or strategy session which culminates in beautiful documentation with a beautiful collection of charts and budgets. But the reality when you go into the research is that over 90% of companies fail to meet their objectives annually and predominantly that is due to over-estimation of the market, under-estimation or under-appreciation of the culture they operate in.

In some cases it's just a rehash of the budget and strategy documents of previous years with very minor consideration for inflation, and also the residency of corporate pride and management ego. This is why many fail.
