

Shelter or a place to live is the most basic and physiological need for humans, according to Maslow's hierarchy of needs. But in Hong Kong, this has been much more than that. Based on Forbes' list of richest Asian families in 2016, three Hong Kong families were ranked among the top 10, all of whom have created their wealth primarily from property. For Hong Kongers, property ownership also provides safety (second level) and even esteem (fourth level of needs).

In 2016, real estate, construction and ownership of premises accounted for 19.1% of Hong Kong's real GDP, and contributed 0.35 percentage points to overall growth of 1.9%.
