

While Hong Kong's once revered luxury goods market has declined markedly in recent years, Wong says that Lamborghini has been somewhat shielded from its impact – a fact he attributes to the company's unique standing as a global icon of achievement.

"We tend to occupy the ultra-luxury market," he explains. "For our client base the luxury car is actually a small part of their assets so it's more on a sentiment basis.

"With a strong brand like Lamborghini, it's viewed as a benchmark for success so we have a strong following in Hong Kong and we're targeting a bigger audience than emerging markets.

"In China for instance, because we have a dealership there, most of our customers are entrepreneurs or owners of companies but here we actually see a lot of professionals becoming our customers, like lawyers, doctors, bankers – these guys are making the kind of dough to put them in that position.

"These are guys that have their life in their own hands and they know what they are doing."

Lamborghini is also seeing renewed interest from female customers, who are increasingly attracted to the supercar market as a symbol of their own power and independence. Naturally, it's a market Wong welcomes with open arms.

